NEW YORK, NY (OCTOBER 1, 2026) — Rodder is pleased to announce James Ensor / Calvin Marcus, a dialogue between artists James Ensor (b. 1860, Ostend, Belgium; d. 1949, Ostend, Belgium) and Calvin Marcus (b. 1988, San Francisco, California). Although the works on view by Ensor and Marcus were created a century apart and within significantly different cultural contexts, both artists have developed visual languages that resist categorization, move between humor, the absurd, the grotesque and the uncanny, and give attention to objects that are often disregarded.

Belgian artist James Ensor's groundbreaking use of masks, grotesque figures, and caricature established him as a formative figure in the development of twentieth-century art. Calvin Marcus is an American artist who works in series, developing stylistically and materially distinct bodies of work that engage with unsettling psychological and social concerns.

Objects occupy a significant place in both practices. Marcus' grandparents were toymakers, while Ensor grew up around his family's shells and porcelain souvenir shop in Ostend. Ensor worked from the attic of his mother's house and shop, surrounded with shells, masks, curios, and souvenirs that would soon become recurring subjects in his work. The mask, in particular, became a motif for examining identity, social performance, and the absurd.

Marcus similarly draws upon familiar or playful objects or environments, their associations and symbolic significance emerging through the work. This shared attentiveness to familiar, but unexpected objects informs the mischievous and uncanny quality that is present in both artists' practices.

The grotesque and absurd take different forms in their work. Marcus often depicts scenes of isolation, solitary figures, sparse still lifes, and expansive or empty landscapes. His works evoke a sense of absence and loneliness, the absurd emerging subtly and often uneasily. Ensor, by contrast, often depicts the grotesque within public and social life, using crowds, caricatures, masks, and scenes of bourgeois society to expose the absurdity of collective behavior and authority.

Their practices are similarly connected by a refusal to adhere to fixed artistic categories. The dialogue exhibition at Rodder will give insight into how Ensor moved between painting, drawing, and printmaking, shifting styles and scale throughout his career, while Marcus works across a wide variety of media including painting, drawing, print-making, and ceramics. For both artists, this movement between forms is accompanied by a close attention to color, surface, composition, and the physicality of their materials; made evident by the works on view.
